Campus Demonstrates Architectural Designs

By Jane Hartley

A picture of ever-changing, ever different architecture, two architecture classes at Winthrop have provided plans for the winning students. Each student has designed a house drawing, following the guidelines of the 1930s and 1940s. The house they have drawn is a two-story, three-bedroom home with a garage. The architecture of the 1930s and 1940s is characterized by a more modern, box-like design, with a focus on functionality and practicality. The students have incorporated these elements into their designs, creating a modern yet timeless aesthetic. The drawings are then presented to the class, allowing for peer feedback and critique. The winning design will be selected by the class, and the winning student will receive a prize and recognition for their work. This project provides an opportunity for students to apply their knowledge of architecture and design, while also developing their creative and critical thinking skills. The project also reinforces the importance of sustainability and the need to consider environmental impacts when designing buildings.

Freshmen Most Active, Says Survey

Health Check-up Reveals Posture Defects, Habits

Freshmen are the most active group of Winthrop's first-year students, and the student's habit of standing in front of the mirror is nothing new. But a health check-up before the gym reveals some habits that are not so good. The students have been warned, but they are still not paying attention.

One of the main problems found in the survey is the students' posture. Many of them have hunched shoulders and poor posture, which can lead to back pain and other health problems. The students are also being advised to improve their posture.

Hobbies For Health—Fun

Things may come and go, but a well-selected hobby will give you a natural and joyful pastime. When choosing a hobby, let your own desires shape your selection. Think about what you enjoy doing and what you can do well.
