The Achromatic and Irradiances of the Women of the South.

This page contains text from a historical article discussing the contributions of women during the American Civil War. The text highlights the role of women as nurses, drivers, and financiers of the war effort. It mentions specific individuals, such as Emma Stansom and Lillian Murphy, and discusses the various ways in which women supported the war, from selling books to organizing relief work. The article also touches on the emotional and physical tolls of the war on women, including the loss of loved ones and the hardships of life during the conflict. The text is written in a formal, journalistic style typical of the time period, and it reflects the perspectives and values of the community at the time.

A winter's night, many, many, long, long ago, there was a battle in the story of Molly Pufahl, at a certain place in battle during a certain war, in one of the states. It was the battle of Shiloh, Tennessee, or was it Bentonville, North Carolina? Be it Betty Taylor Phillips, of Kentwood, or was it Betty Taylor Phillips of the States and the South? Is it a battle for the State of Kentucky or for the State of Kansas? Individual voices of daring and exultation have sung the battle songs of the South. They may have been sung in jest, but in the words of one of the South's leading historians, the songs were “the refrain of the battle.”
