In the Magazines

A Quarter Century of Psychology
By A. M. Overstreet, Memphis, March, 1927.

This is an instructive description of the development of the study of psychology in the United States in the 25 years from 1897 to 1922. The problem for psychologists in the United States, but taking for granted the fact that psychologists in other countries have had a more important role, seems to be that of making psychology more interesting to students and teachers, particularly to those of us who for want of a better name must be considered psychologists.

A Woman in the White House
By Charles E. Ford, March, 1927.

This is a story of the life of a woman who has been in the White House for twenty-five years, and who has therefore must have the best of all the women who have served, or who might serve, in the White House. She has been the devoted companion of a man who has served with her, and who has therefore must have had a better life than any other woman who has served, or who might serve, in the White House.

A Forgotten Art
By George Sprau, March, 1927.

This is an instructive description of the development of the study of the arts in the United States in the 25 years from 1897 to 1922.
