The Trail | Lauren Clark

I know it well,
The trail to the old rusted car
The left turn down toward the pond
Filled with our fifth-grade reflections.
That place where we hid when our parents
Found the hole we dug
In hopes of treasure.
We would run,
Barefoot in warm summer rain
To catch frogs with our open hands.
We kept them
In that old chicken coop
Behind your house.
We heard your mother scream
And ran out,
Back to that place
Where we never grew up.

Though now,
I go back and look down
Into the water
Staring at the face that chose to age.
But behind that reflection I still see us,
Mud-covered, barefoot, and running.
