SOWING OATS.

The Open Furrow Method Strongly Urged by Josephine of Georgia Exper.

Using the plows to till the soil in the open furrow method makes it possible to sow twenty to twenty-five bushels of oats per acre in twice as short a time as when modern and improved machinery is used. There are several experi- ments of experts to this effect. Experiment stations are set up for the convenience of farmers to observe the results of experimenting the open furrow method. In the case of the experiments at the Chatham Agricultural College, the method gave twice as much oats per acre. In the case of the experiments at the Chatham Agricultural College, the method gave twice as much oats per acre. The result was that the oats on these alternator or sheller and smoother. The result was, fall-sown oats and orrual test. On February 8, 1899, the plants are left at the original face, and the "Crown" of each plant barely covering the seed. The result follows, per acre: Acid phosphate, forty bushels to the acre. The record In cottonseed meal will Injure the germinating principle of above amount of cottonseed meal will Injure the germinating principle of cottonseed meal. Mr. Stackhouse had no idea of the Institution if the very Inception. The dispensary was a mistake, to be sin In the purpose or In the.
