I distinctly remember dying.
my body in a cream, bedazzled dress, with flesh as still as streams.
see,
I was a bystander at my funeral, with full intentions to judge the ceremony, I stood as enormous as God before the casket, confirming the end of a prequel, how my epilogue turned elegy the “to-be-continued” turned tragedy, could not be carried further.
the crowd was scattered amongst hardwood pews, decked in black
staring at my temple
made up as this angel.
but no,
to live like Christ I must die to self.
perish mundane desires, smother bleeding flames that ignite my spirit for a moment, then set the dwellings
I’ve built, aflame.
I was and am
a professional Arsonist despite the stories pastor relays at my funeral,
The Mother of Burning Bridges except,
“The Witch Doesn’t Burn in this One.”
the wheat that bears much fruit the burial of a life not lived, I die to sin
and live to Righteousness.
