The darker side of history is not so well known as is the brighter side, and it is best that it is so. The history of a nation is written primarily to set its Progress in the arts, the sciences, and religion; in making prominent those elements which go toward making a people better and greater. Behind all this is the dark side, the crime, the horror.

That wonderful people to whom the present world is so familiar, the Romans, have their atrocities; the invasion of the Carthaginians, the fire and pillage of the city of Rome. But the history of the Romans is not so much written as is the history of the Turks, the Moors, and the others. The history of the Turks is not so well written as is the history of the Romans. The history of the Turks is not so well written as is the history of the Moors. The history of the Moors is not so well written as is the history of the Turks. The potatoes. After peeling the potatoes, the potatoes were put in a large basket and covered with sand. The sand was sifted off and the potatoes were placed in a well-ventilated area to dry. It was a cold day, and the potatoes were set in the sunlight to dry. By the time the potatoes were ready to be stored, they were a deep red color and had a firm texture. The potatoes were stored in large boxes, and they were kept in a cool, dry place to preserve them.

The potatoes were preserved in this way for several years. The following spring, the potatoes were dug up and the following fall, the potatoes were again planted. The potatoes were a valuable crop for the family and were used for food throughout the winter. The potatoes were also sold to other families in the community, and they were a staple food in the area.
