DO WE GROW WORSE.

Northern Illinois, Sept. 15—In the World's Fair, as in all parliaments, there was a great deal of argument, discussion, and debate. But when the smoke cleared away, the result was that the delegates, with a few exceptions, agreed that conditions in the world were worse than they had been before the war.

The delegates were divided into three main groups: those who believed in the old order, those who believed in the new order, and those who had no faith in either.

The old order group believed that the world was worse because of the war, and that the only way to make it better was to return to the old ways. They argued that the war had created a new and dangerous situation, and that the only solution was to return to the old ways.

The new order group believed that the world was worse because of the war, and that the only way to make it better was to create a new order. They argued that the war had created a new and dangerous situation, and that the only solution was to create a new order.

The group with no faith in either argued that the war was a necessary evil, and that the only way to make it better was to continue fighting. They argued that the war was a necessary evil, and that the only solution was to continue fighting.

The delegates were not able to agree on a solution, and the World's Fair was a failure. The delegates returned home to their countries, and the world continued to get worse.
