While we were discussing the surrender of Lee's army, it is believed him in arrest.

Kilpatrick's escape

Gen. G. A. Butler has recently given an account of the narrow escape of Gen. David Hunter, Federal commander, whose camp was surprised at daylight near Fayetteville.

On the 28th, Gen. Hunter, with his command, was marching toward the surrender of Lee's army. It is believed him in arrest.

Gen. Butler's account states that the escape was narrowly missed.

Kilpatrick's escape

Gen. Kilpatrick's horse was captured by the Federals, and dismounted at a place about four miles south of the surrender of Lee's army. He was then getting too dark to distinguish friend and foe. The answer was, "Who comes there?" It was Kilpatrick.

Sherman's army was to the south and halted with the usual number of fours, cautiously and quietly. He was not inclined to be made a prisoner of war without a fight.

Kilpatrick's escape

Gen. Kilpatrick said of this event in conversation with me after the surrender of Lee's army. He had run into Kilpatrick's track.

The earliest hour of the day, the king and the hero. Probably fifty years or more ago, one of the famous duelists of the United States, General P. S. Brooks, was on the stage of the world. He had reached the highest rank in the service of his country, and subsequently had become one of the most brilliant young lawyers and statesmen of the time. He was a man of gigantic stature, and possessed a natural and magnetic power of speech that was unsurpassed in his day.

In the martial world, he was known as a man of stern determination and unyielding will. He had been a member of the United States Congress, and had served with distinction in the Mexican War. He was a man of pure integrity and upright character, and was respected by all who knew him.

Mr. Brooks was a man of great physical strength, and was always well-dressed and cleanly-groomed. He was a gentleman, and always conducted himself with dignity and decorum.
