DOUBLE MASTED BREE CHIPPY

J. G. Wuling of Feasterville.

ERIE IN SCHOOL LAW,

It is a generally admitted that the "lost cause" in which the noses of the two big cotton exchanges at New York and New Orleans was essential to the prosperity of the largest families in the county.

During the Civil War, the great-grandfather of the late Chester County politician, Mr. J. G. Wulling, was a member of the House of Representatives from the state of Maine, and was a prominent figure in the abolition movement. He had several children by his first marriage, and his second wife, Julia, was the daughter of a prominent doctor in the county.

The eldest son and daughter are living in Chester County, now known as the Citadel Academy. He had one son and daughter by his first marriage, and two by his second marriage.

The late Mr. Wulling was a man of wealth and property, and was respected by all who knew him. He died in Philadelphia, and was buried in the family plot in Feasterville.

TALES OF THE LANTERN

THE NATURAL RESOURCES

There were two big cotton exchanges at New York and New Orleans. The State of New York, which was one of the largest cotton producers in the country, was also one of the largest cotton consumers. The cotton was grown in the southern states, and was shipped north by rail and by river. The cotton was then marketed in the New York and New Orleans cotton exchanges. The cotton was then sold to the manufacturers, and the profits were divided among the growers, the brokers, and the merchants.

The war correspondents were the men who covered the war for the newspapers. They were a select group of men who were chosen by the newspapers to cover the war. They were the men who wrote the stories about the war, and who gave the public a glimpse of what was happening on the battlefield.
