INSECT PESTS AND DISEASES OF THE TOMATO.

You have already received letters from me on this subject, in which you were instructed how to select and prepare your soil, and to plant the plant, and other conditions, all of which are necessary for the successful growth of your tomato crop. You have been told of the importance of the early transplant, and how to transplant, fertilize, and cultivate the plant, and how to keep your plants healthy and free from diseases and insects. You have been told that you may expect to have both trouble and success, and that you may expect to have both trouble and success, and that you may expect to have both trouble and success, and that you may expect to have both trouble and success, and that you may expect to have both trouble and success.

Insects and diseases are very prevalent in the tomato crop, and if you are not careful, you may be surprised by finding that your vegetables are infested with insects, and that they are attacked by diseases, which will destroy your crops.

The most common pests are the tomato worm, the tomato beetle, the tomato leafhopper, and the tomato aphid. These pests are very injurious to the tomato crop, and if you are not careful, you may be surprised by finding that your vegetables are infested with insects, and that they are attacked by diseases, which will destroy your crops.

Prompt attention given to all calls.
