The WINTER GARDEN

It is useless to say any word about the values of a winter garden because everyone appreciates fully the fruits of the many hours spent in fresh vegetable during the winter.

There is a number of vegetables that can be had during the winter months, but to have them they must be grown during the time of year when there is normally an abundance of vegetables, just because we have all the vegetables we want to eat and we must eat a winter garden.

Fortunately the vegetables of first importance for winter use are those that are hardy and make excellent plants for the table. The most satisfactory of these are the following:

- Spinach
- Carrots
- Radishes
- Lettuce
- Kale

Spinach is a very choice and nutritious vegetable and is a very desirable addition to any winter garden.

Parsnips and carrots are excellent vegetables and are recommended for the winter garden.

Kale is a very satisfactory vegetable and should be in the early fall. The cured broccoli is a very desirable vegetable and should be included in the winter garden.

Squash is a vegetable that can be grown early in the fall, in the early spring, and can be harvested during the winter months.

For fall and winter use the tomatoes should be sown in the open ground in June and the plants transplanted to the cellar in the fall. The best variety for this purpose is the "Black Beauty." The St. Louis market is a very good variety for this purpose.

Squash planted early in September and with favorable weather will produce edible fruits before the first frost.

For winter use the radishes are the best type of turnip. Radishes should be planted between the last of August and the first of September and thinned out to six inches in the drills.

Squash should keep well until early spring when they will ripen and mature during the winter months. The best varieties for this purpose are the "Black Beauty" and the "Black Star." The St. Louis market is a very good variety for this purpose.
