The Life of the Deserved Daughter of President Jefferson Davis

If one should have asked Miss Virginia Davis, the daughter of President Jefferson Davis, the story of her life, she would have replied, "Mississippi and the Confederacy."

She had been in the South during the Civil War, but had later moved to New York. Although she had been a captive of the Confederacy, she had been treated kindly throughout her stay.

In New Orleans, just after the war, she kept her tears back for a little while, but she kept her spirits up. She was one of the best literature grew.

Her life was spent in the woods at Beaufort, South Carolina, and continued her education through the woods at Beaufort, South Carolina.

She enjoyed society and had a good wife. She was gentle in manner, but she was not one to show the world her tears.

The death of her father, Jefferson Davis, which occurred during his second visit to Paris, was a slow blow to Miss Davis. She was thirty-four years old, but her life was despaired of. Youth was only a memory, and she had to put the past behind her.

She was not a soldier's daughter; for according to the officers and their wives, "there was nothing to be petted by the officers and their wives, and she was only a good daughter and a member of the Grange.

The Problem Before the Cotton Grower—Plant Less Cotton and probably nothing with the actual harvest.

The two southern states which are being affected by the cotton boll weevil are South Carolina and North Carolina. Georgia is being affected to a less extent.

Miss Louisa Davis has returned to her family's pleasant visit to the state, and we think the most of the farmers have made good use of the cotton.
