The phone girl will never again speak, long after the telephone's been hung up. For if any one else were there where she is, she could not hear them for the noise of the room. But she can never return to the telephone because she is dead.

The old lady, the woman who had made the telephone bell ring, had been dead for more than a year. She had died quietly in her sleep. The family had been surprised at first, for she had seemed perfectly well. But they had found that she had been medicine for the past six months, and that her condition had been steadily growing worse. She had been in the hospital for a month before her death, but the doctors had been unable to discover the cause of her illness.

The family were grief-stricken at the news of her death, and they had decided to hold a private memorial service for her. They had invited only a few close friends, and they had all come to say good-bye to the old lady. The service had been simple and sincere, and the family had been comforted by the presence of their friends.

The telephone bell had rung once more, just as the service was drawing to a close. From the room next door, they could hear the sound of a child's voice. It was a voice that they had always associated with the old lady, and they knew that it could only be her. They turned to look, and there she was, standing in the doorway. She was alive! They were surprised, but they were also overjoyed, for they knew that she had been missed more than they could say. She was their Hope M. Baker, the one who had made the telephone bell ring.

The family were overjoyed when they saw her, and they rushed to welcome her back. They had a great deal to say to her, and they told her of all the things that had happened since she had left. She listened carefully, and she seemed pleased to be back among them.
