And they thought I wouldn't notice

As Light Runs from a Frozen Star | Lindsey Monroe

Drowning in the context you tried to hide me in, my originality was overshadowed limited to less than the sky though it deserves the limitlessness of the universe.
I became asphyxiated by the waves of your manipulation and love
as they washed over me like a polluted estuary that kills shiny, cerulean fish.
The brightness in my soul was dimmed, and my bluebird song finally found inexorable release in its surrender.

I am imprinted by his back.
I was whiplashed by his taut-then-sack grasp.

I was unzipped by a hand, once warm and sure, that now plants in the hand of a man I’ve never seen but on a gleaming, sterile screen that leaves an outline seared on my eyes.

So hellbent on staying shut to banish a sight over which I’ve been so set on seething.
I open my eyes to see my fists bound around nothing but my own folded, cold fingers.

My knuckles drain of blood, as my grasp tightens vice-like and my eyelids clench, and once more I see his back imprinted on my mind.
My grasp slackens, leaving my whole body lax, nonporous, and hollow.
