Memories Like Muscadine Vines | Loren Mixon

I am from Sunday morning donuts sickly sweet, that make cardboard communion wafers taste a little bitter. from jack and ginger poolside the crudely painted tiki sign illuminated by lightening bugs, from barefoot heat blisters cooled in crabgrass and sprinklers, from duffle bags packed and biking to the creek down the road, planning creekbed homes with minnow parents, from making wild onion and wisteria perfume to spill on my favorite stuffed animal.

I am from fried turkey and lasagne on an Italian Thanksgiving battered in the South, from the Carolina holidays every Saturday in the Fall where leaves crunch under your feet as you throw footballs outside the stadium where Howard’s Rock stood, stately, from sleepovers in basements with a million taxidermied eyes staring back at you and antlers to hang your coats on, from the dollar movie theater that closed eight years ago where my mother used to go on dates.

I am from memories I cling to like muscadine vines and putting tender feet on burning pavement to remember the past.
